We use diagrams to educate, to inform, and also to learn how things work in the world. And as new advances are made in the area of neuroscience, we will be shown new insights about the mind, its potentialities, and the way it really works. By way of example, recent research conducted in the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford has proved that consciousness is a nondeterministic phenomenon. This usually means there is no method to control how we experience our lives, no matter how hard we try. So, how does this link to the brain Let us face it the more we know about consciousness, the more we realize its a phenomenon which can not be properly understood without first understanding more about the brain. To put it differently, we need to see the link between the two. Consciousness is supposed to arise from the activity of certain neurons in the brain, and the question remains as to why they passion in certain routines to be able to induce awareness. However, there are only certain types of neurons that could sense light, which might explain why some individuals have various degrees of consciousness depending on the kind of stimuli they are exposed to. A lot of people feel that the brain is a machine that generates and stores information. Their view is based on the known actuality that the brain functions by studying information coming from the eyes and interpreting it. As such, an individual would assume that the brain produces conscious awareness by studying sensory input from the human body and interpreting it. A recent study with a neurophysiology research team has shown that they can control the nerve cells in the visual cortex of the brain with electrical stimulation. During this process, they were able to produce an epileptic seizure in their participants. The technique does not use invasive surgery on the topic, but rather, it induces the release of chemicals that control the action of the neurons in the visual cortex of the brain. <http://cykjsj.com/uploadfile/20200909011926.xml>

In addition, the researchers discovered it had been possible to purify the mind to control neural action in any region of the human body.
